Barre quarries among other eastern granite producers are watching with interest the experiments of quarrying being made at the granite quarries in Raymond, Cal., which if successful would mean a saving of great expense to quarry owners and enable them to develop their quarry lands and produce granite much cheaper than ever before. The process involved to some seems impossible, yet it worked to satisfaction in North Carolina and Georgia quarries and is now being tried at Raymond, Cal. An excerpt from "Mine and Quarry," a publication issued by the Sullivan Machinery Co. of Claremont, N. H., and Chicago, Ill., tells an interesting story of the development and gives one a good idea of the process involved at Raymond: "In order to establish working faces, a method similar to that followed in North Carolina and Georgia has been successfully employed. A small shaft, widening out at the bottom is drilled and filled with water. The top is then sealed, and connected, by piping, to high pressure pumps, which force in additional water, so that the granite is kept under heavy pressure for days and weeks at a time, until the split or seam, started at the bottom of the shaft, reaches a free face. A large sheet of granite of varying thickness is thus made available for working. The largest piece of granite ever quarried at this operation was 248 feet in length, 40 feet in width and 22 feet thick."
